Platform Statement:

It would be nice to say that our profession is in a good place. On one hand, we've made tremendous strides in elevating the quality of our care, embracing innovation, and integrating our members into academic and multispecialty healthcare teams. On the other hand, we have persistent reimbursement disparity, publications from non-DPM organizations attacking our surgical outcomes, organizations within our profession encroaching upon and weakening the significance of our surgical board certification, and a student recruitment crisis we have never seen before. It may seem the "negatives" are outweighing the "positives".

Our profession has faced many challenges throughout its history...scope of practice, hospital privileging, acceptance amongst other specialties, and recognition as the experts in our own field just to name a few. Resiliency has driven us through these issues, some of which we continue to battle. And while the College is founded in education, it serves our members through many more avenues.

My vision for the future of our profession is a continued elevation of the specialty. This means working with outside organizations to support our shared, long-term goals. A perfect example of this is our recent partnership with AO North America to offer premier, resident surgical education courses. This means supporting research initiatives within the college and combating negative publications with outcomes-driven data from a national registry. Our registry initiative has been thoughtfully mapped out and is steadily moving forward. This means diversifying our methods of education delivery to meet our members' changing needs. This means directing resources toward the fight against reimbursement disparity. This means enhancing our ACFAS-approved fellowships without cannibalizing our residency programs. And lastly, this means pledging resources to address the student recruitment crisis. We cannot have a strong College without members, and the next generation of students will be vital to our success.

In closing, I respectfully submit my application for the Board of Directors. I've dedicated almost every year since the conclusion of my residency as a volunteer for this great organization. I hope to continue serving the membership in this capacity, completing important initiatives started by the board, and ultimately driving our profession forward through the vision of the College.
